simple service reference (WCF) for the first time on a new project. I've added all the references with no trouble and created a service contract by following this guide: My methods work fine and I can successfully call them. The problem is that the service gets registered in my Add Service Reference window as a service reference, where it is listed as not mapped. The point is, I want to have it configured as a service reference instead. I've tried updating the service with a generated proxy file, and opening that in my WCF service project. The error that I get is: Cannot import a project that is not supported by the selected target framework. This is as I should expect, since it is a WCF service reference, not a WCF service. How can I get this to work? A: The steps you've taken to create a WCF service reference are correct. Here is the important information to be taken note of when doing this: Visual Studio Creates a project file as a .NET Framework 3.5/WCF-style Service

Application Project. When Visual Studio creates a WCF-style Service Application project, the reference item in the Add Service Reference dialog includes the following option: Add Service Reference: The project you are creating is a WCF-style Service Application project, not a WCF Service project. However, the WCF

Download PC And save.Q: Nativescript - error handling when constructing objects I am using a radiobuttonlist in my custom component which is used to display a list of items from a json file. This component is used in my listview item and I am using the event.propertyPath to set the values of my object (this.object in my javascript code). However, when the object I want to use is not present in the json file I get an error. Is there a way to write a custom error handler that will be executed if an object is not present in the json file? I can't use resolve in this case because my radiobuttonlist is used in a listview item and I would like to have a custom way of showing an error. A: In your data module, you can define an empty function in your component.ts file which you can then use like this: this.object = {}; //this.object is your object dataModule.emptyFunction() This should avoid the error message, but your data object is still uninitialized. You could also try using props to initialize the object instead of the component's this context. This means that when you're defining the function, you'd have to remove the context parameter (like this.object = {};) and pass the props into the function. Here's a good example of that Q: How to find all possible positions of objects in a matrix?
