Star Plus Drama Serial Saraswatichandra episode 438 Full Episode.Q: Is there an alignment of C strings that allows malloc() to return aligned memory? I have a C-specific question - in C as I understand it, if I were to allocate memory for a single C string with malloc(), I could assume that the first character returned would be aligned to a 32 bit boundary. But the extra padding on the end of the string might be a problem for alignment constraints I don't see. Is there any guarantee that the first character of the memory returned by malloc() would be aligned to a 32 bit boundary? A: is there an alignment of C strings that allows malloc() to return aligned memory? Yes. You need to use calloc() instead of malloc(). If you want to avoid the extra padding that is not mandated by the C Standard, you can use the realloc() function (which is also described in the C Standard) to allocate bigger chunks. If you absolutely need the first byte to be aligned, you can do something like:

char* my_string =
malloc(sizeof(char)n); char p =
my_string; do { *p++ = (char)k; }
while (++k < n);

Q: PHP, loop until $script_break statement is executed

I'm using a for loop that first executes a series of script statements and then ends with an exit() function call. I have an else clause which calls an else function if a certain condition is met. This condition happens frequently, so what I would like to do is either loop

until the exit() function is called, or loop until the exit() function is called and the last time it is called. It's probably easy to accomplish with a second loop, but I'm curious if this could be done with a single loop.

$filename = 'userdao.php';
$statements = file(__FILE__, FILE_IGNORE
                  1cdb36666d
