What if you.A nonlinear model of blood perfusion of a capillary bed in response to sudden changes of arterial pressure. A nonlinear mathematical model describing the effects of a step increase in blood pressure on blood perfusion in a capillary bed has been developed. The model is based on consideration of the rate of diffusion of glucose from blood plasma into capillary capillary walls. According to the results of vascular diameter measurements in a number of capillary beds, the tissue permeability coefficient, and the initial plasma concentration of glucose, the model was adjusted to vascular diameters and steady state concentrations of glucose. A direct relation was found between the mean velocity of the exchange of glucose from plasma into the capillary wall and the transcapillary pressure gradient. The transcapillary pressure gradient determines the rate of glucose diffusion in the capillary walls. The estimated transcapillary pressure gradient of 16 mmHg is compatible with the glucose levels measured in the working muscle of anaesthetized man subjected to an abrupt
