FRANKFURT (Reuters) - Germany's emissions control sector will become more competitive through tough new energy-saving regulations, even at the cost of higher greenhouse gas emissions, German carmakers' association VDA said on Monday. Numerous U.S.-based carmakers have announced plans to shift production to lower-cost plants in the United States from Germany because of the new U.S. tariffs on steel and aluminum - a move which prompted calls by German officials to halt supply chains. Germany's "black list" of products was supposed to be reviewed in mid-July, but it was extended in a measure designed to avoid blocking out many foreign-made exports of cars and car parts which could otherwise be re-exported and sold. In its annual industry report, the VDA, which represents automakers and their suppliers, said blacklists would definitely be extended in the new year, but suggested few German-produced materials would be excluded. “The longer the black list is, the more robust, diversified and competitive the emissions control (industry) becomes,” VDA Chief Managing Director Frank Hoffmann said. Indeed, VDA said Berlin was in favor of the new law, as well as other measures proposed by Chancellor Angela Merkel’s government, which include a hardening of the automotive sector, opening up the energy market and bringing in tough new taxes. “The black list is the right thing to do to safeguard German business interests in the automotive sector,” Hoffmann said. ❖

Adaptation (or low-level suppression) to an expanding pattern of dots has been used to examine perceptual processing within primary visual cortex (V1), but has not yet been used to study adaptation to distortions of visuospatial features. In this study we examine adaptation to ring distortions in primary visual cortex. Dots were presented on a high-contrast (100%), low spatial-frequency grating (radius 5 degrees) to which a ring distortion of radius 10 degrees, 20 degrees, or 30 degrees was added. A constant region in the center of the stimulus was the only source of visual input, allowing us to examine the basis of adaptation specifically to the visuospatial features of the pattern (that is, outside the region of adaptation to the gratings). Over the course of four 40-min sessions, V1 in five subjects showed increased responses to both the target and the background gratings for both 10 degree and 20 degree ring distortions. By contrast, in V1 of two subjects no increase in the background response was evident for a 30 degree distortion, either in the last session or across the four sessions, and a similar pattern of results was observed in another subject in the last session only. Notably, the two subjects who did not show adaptation to a 30 degree distortion showed adaptation to a 20 degree distortion in the first session only. These findings indicate that adaptation of the primary visual cortex is selective to the shape of the stimulus, with adaptation to the features e79caf774b
